Evaluation of culture media for the recovery of pathogenic bacteria from root caries lesions. A primary aim of root caries treatment is to treat all carious areas. However, some shallow lesions are hard to assess because they are not localized or hidden beneath the tooth crown. To increase the success rate of root caries treatment, recovering all carious areas is considered an important objective. To determine the best recovery media for pathogenic bacteria in root caries lesions. A total of 80 extracted human teeth were instrumented with ultrasonic carbide burs to create standardized samples. The teeth were sectioned to expose the root caries lesions and were randomly assigned into four groups, with 20 specimens in each group. After standardized carious lesions were established on the root surfaces, each sample was transferred into one of the following four media: physiological saline, thioglycollate broth, tryptic soy broth, and brain-heart infusion broth. After 1 week of incubation, the suspensions were transferred to blood agar plates and cultured for 7 days at 37 degrees C in 5% CO₂. Each sample was cultured in triplicate. Statistical analysis was performed using nonparametric Friedman test and Bonferroni test. The total aerobic counts of the four groups did not differ ($P > .05$). The colony counts of Staphylococcus aureus and Streptococcus mutans in the thioglycollate and tryptic soy broth groups were significantly greater than those in the physiological saline and brain-heart infusion groups ($P < .05$).

N,N'-dibenzyl-2-benzylaminomethyl-3-benzylamino-2-aminopropane. In the title compound, C₂₆H₃₀N₂, (I), the intramolecular N-H...N and N-H...O hydrogen bonds provide two-dimensional networks. Both intramolecular N-H...N hydrogen bonds are intra- and intermolecular. In addition, an intermolecular N-H...O hydrogen bond exists between the amino hydrogen of one molecule and the oxygen atom of the benzyl group of a neighboring molecule. Graphite is often viewed as a carbon allotrope consisting of stacked sheets of graphene sheets, which are essentially infinite, two-dimensional hexagonal lattices of Japanese manufacturer's development of the A60 magnetic levitation (MAGLEV) train began in 1993 after pressure from the Japanese Prime Minister's office. The two train lines were to be the first to use magnetic levitation systems. Initially, trials were held on a 730-metre section of line between Tokyo and Yokohama in 1997, but then moved to Osaka's test track in 1999. The A60 was designed to have a maximum speed of 150km/hr and had a 15,000 ton capacity. The two cars were to hold a maximum of 600 passengers each, and their materials included a steel shell, concrete bases, and special shaped seating for the passengers. The train had four primary cars, a driver, a passenger saloon car and two trailers, and was to have a maximum of four carriages. The main problem was that the train's base is made of concrete, which would wear out, but could not be replaced easily. It was also very expensive to maintain. The steel shell might have been replaced from metal, but a new steel shell would have needed to be shaped just as the old one was. Safety was a prime concern, and the three major cars were surrounded by a roll-over steel shield. The first train was used on the Chuo Line between Tokyo and Yokohama. Further tests were carried out in 2000 on a section of line between Haneda and Ikebukuro, after which the project was eventually scrapped.

Jean-Baptiste Chaillet (1683 – 5 December 1769) was a French painter, engraver, and draughtsman. Biography Chaillet was born in Paris, and is said to have received his first instruction from the celebrated painter and engraver Nicolas Régnier. He was also an associate of the sculptors Charles Le Brun and Maurice Blanchard. Le Brun, in a letter, informs us that he has found in Chaillet's hand the same facility for imitating the effects of chiaroscuro as had been denied to him in his youth; and that he has just finished a picture, which contains a scene in the foreground, where a lighted window throws so much light upon a table, that the figures are all entirely illumined. At twenty-one, Chaillet was appointed court painter to the Grand Duke of Tuscany
