

Windows Installer is becoming the "de facto" software installation technology in Windows. Being pre-installed in the latest Microsoft operating systems, as well as ... (what should I call it?) in the Windows Vista version. As News.com reports, in many cases installation is done in the background, using what is known as an installation package. This technology is so widespread that it has actually become the de facto standard for installing software. This means that software installation can be done on all computers and laptops.
