The aim of this study was to describe breastfeeding experiences of women after a breech birth. The participants were recruited during a hospital visit with the baby within 3 months of birth. In this qualitative study we used a purposeful sample of 12 women. The interviews were recorded, transcribed and analysed by two authors. Data saturation was reached after 12 interviews. The experience of breastfeeding differed substantially among the women. Participants emphasized the importance of the positive breastfeeding experience and of being able to continue breastfeeding. However, they also expressed that it was difficult to continue breastfeeding when the baby was tired and needed to feed frequently. They did not feel that they were supported by the health care professionals. The results show the need for support during the first weeks of breastfeeding in relation to the experience of a breech birth. Further research is needed to identify how to support women who experience a breech birth and breastfeeding.

The incidence of self-reported bariatric surgery in the English population. Despite the expanding numbers of bariatric procedures and the impact of bariatric surgery on long-term weight control, there is uncertainty regarding the incidence of bariatric procedures in the general population. The aim of this study was to describe the incidence of bariatric surgery in the general population in England. Data on people aged 16 years and over who had undergone bariatric surgery and whose general practitioner had provided their current weight were extracted from the Health Improvement Network (THIN) database. Incidence of bariatric surgery in England was estimated for January 2004 to September 2009, as the number of procedures performed. Bariatric surgery had been carried out on 4252 people in England during this period. The number of bariatric procedures performed in England increased from 3 per 100,000 in 2004 to 25 per 100,000 in 2009. The total population in England increased from 60.6 million in 2004 to 63.5 million in 2009, but the number of
