The development of AutoCAD was a major project that required many years of extensive R&D, including new programming languages and high-speed processing. AutoCAD/AutoLISP, an innovative, dual-language system that used both AutoLISP and a proprietary AutoCAD-specific programming language for development, helped fuel the development of advanced features and introduced the idea of program macros. This early 1980s CAD system became widely used in architecture, engineering, construction, and manufacturing. The software has also been used in game design, architecture visualization, and many other fields. Autodesk started the development of AutoCAD with the aim of making a real-time, vector graphics drawing system. At the time, this software system became popular for architectural and engineering work in many fields, including architecture and engineering education.
