1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to the control of an internal combustion engine and more particularly, to improvements in controlling the injection of fuel into the combustion chambers of a diesel engine.
2. Description of the Prior Art Among the factors which determine the performance of a diesel engine is the rate of combustion of the fuel. Among the most significant factors influencing the rate of combustion of the fuel is the rate at which fuel can be injected into the engine's combustion chambers. This rate can be accurately measured by the amount of time it takes for fuel to flow from a pump to a nozzle or injector for subsequent injection into a combustion chamber. Accordingly, the ability to accurately measure the rate of fuel flow to an injector could provide a means for controlling the rate of combustion of the fuel in a diesel engine and consequently, the emissions of NO<sub>x</sub> and other pollutants such as CO. While the rate at which fuel is injected into the combustion chamber can be controlled with the degree of precision of a fuel injection pump, the exact time at which fuel is injected into the combustion chamber cannot be controlled because it depends upon the speed of the fuel injection pump. The time at which fuel is injected into the combustion chamber of a diesel engine can be controlled by a fuel injection timing cycle which can be varied by control of the firing angle of an injector. For example, injection of fuel into the combustion chamber can be timed to occur near the top dead center of the piston's compression stroke, near the bottom dead center of the expansion stroke, or midway between the top dead center and the bottom dead center. However, because the angle of the injector and the injector nozzle are not always exactly aligned with the piston's direction of movement within the cylinder bore, the timing of the injection of fuel to the combustion chamber can vary significantly and adversely effect the rate at which fuel is injected to the combustion chamber. In diesel engines it is known to utilize fuel injectors which are adjustable, closed-loop valves, which allow for a predetermined amount of leakage to equalize pressure between the fuel chamber and the injector's nozzle chamber. The leakage is controlled by a series of needle
