He is credited with giving England its name and unifying its various tribes. According to a 13th century English monk, Annales Cambriae, Alfred was a Christian and believed in a single omnipotent God, though little is known of his personal beliefs. He is regarded as the most powerful king of England, based on his reconstruction of the kingdom after it was sacked by the Danes during the early 9th century. In the year 899 his kingdom was attacked by the invading Danes, who burned down the town of London. Alfred managed to beat the invaders, but his victory was short-lived. In 901 the Danes returned to England, burned down London and besieged the town of Bedford, which was burned down too. Alfred, determined not to allow the enemy to achieve their goal, and to preserve life as much as possible, moved his army to Scotland and sent them to attack the enemy. In 902 the battle of Crayford took place. The battle was a total victory for the Anglo-Saxons, and Alfred's military force was preserved.
