Students use the Internet for a variety of reasons, including: to search for information, products, and services; to communicate via email, chat rooms, and instant messaging; to review scholarly articles, and to post comments and feedback. Social responsibility has become an integral part of an individual's duty as a responsible student. Many colleges and universities, public and private, have developed courses and programs to address the responsible use of the Internet. Among these are academic ethics, civility, cyber-bullying and plagiarism. In the developed world, the Internet has provided us with enormous social, economic and technological benefits.

However, the Internet has also become a major tool of business and commerce. It has also become a platform for individuals to express their opinions and to find community on all levels of our society. There is an obvious need to educate our youth about the boundaries that exist in the use of the Internet. One of these is academic integrity. * Thinking of buying this?
