We conducted a controlled trial of a social influence intervention designed to increase physical activity among young adults (aged 18-24 years). Male and female participants read either general-purpose "heart-healthy" messages in the control group or (in a 2-week trial) messages that we developed specifically to influence activity. Across groups, physical activity increased at each of the follow-up data collection points. Finally, messages that resulted in increases in physical activity in the control group predicted increases in physical activity among intervention participants.
