Cytomorphology of alveolar plasma cell granuloma: a distinctive lung lesion showing a bright, coffee-bean appearance. Alveolar plasma cell granulomas (PCGs) are uncommon pulmonary lesions usually showing evidence of scarring. There are few reports describing the cytomorphology of PCGs. To describe the cytomorphology of PCGs in an attempt to resolve the controversy about the growth pattern of the lesion. Four cases of PCGs diagnosed in two different institutions were reviewed. A distinctive, characteristic appearance of the cells forming the lesion was described. In the present study, we used cytomorphologic criteria to demonstrate that the atypical plasma cell derived cells are actually scattered through the mass. The bright appearance of the lesion is the result of
