Q: std::array initialization and overloading Why doesn't std::array initialize elements in same order as it's declaration in operator[]? int main() { std::array a{ 1,2,3,4,5,6,7,8,9 }; return 0; } expected output: 1,2,3,4,5,6,7,8,9 actual output: 1,4,9,2,5,8,3,7,6,9 A: I don't think the standard cares about order. The indexing is deferred to the element construction.
Q: What is difference between state and stateful? What is difference between stateless and stateful in web-service. I know that a stateful service is just web-service but when we expose an interface to a client this service can have mutable state. A: A service can be stateless or stateful. Statelessness implies that there's a one-way data exchange: the client requests something from the service, the service responds, and then the service doesn't care what the client does afterwards. You could argue that if you were dealing with a browser session, where the client opens up, does some work, and then closes the browser, but you are essentially correct that the service doesn't care. When you have state, the service knows what the client did in the past and the service can respond in a meaningful way. If there is no state, the service may be able to respond based on the client's behavior in the past, but it doesn't know much about the future. A: I think that is what you are asking. A service can be stateless or stateful A stateless service essentially means that when a request comes in and a certain operation takes place, it provides you with a response. Stateless services do not care what you are going to do with the response, it's just going to tell you what happened in the request. A stateful service means that a request comes in and it provides you with an operation. The operation could be something like login, or produce a list of 10 items. When the response comes back for that operation it provides you with a response to the operation. It could

Post navigation I'm knee deep in research... So, as you probably guessed, this is the first in a series of posts that describe what I'm doing and how it's going. I'll try and keep the overall theme "how I'm doing" – the body modifications and the rest. 2 thoughts on "I'm knee deep in research..." [...] It has taken me most of the last two years to refine that idea into something that actually works. I'm not satisfied with the results. They're not what I thought they would be. And, surprisingly, my original goals are not being met. [...]Should the pontiff have an assisstant? Should the Pope have an assistant? Click to expand... This is an interesting topic. Every pope ever (I believe) wanted to have a priest/bishop to assist him. I have found out that Francis is the first one without an assistant. That may mean that he is intent on raising the bar of leadership and that he would rather do it himself than have an assistant. Some of the things that Francis has said are: Pope Francis has made it clear that he prefers to carry out any pastoral work himself and has no time or desire to have anyone at his side during his visits to hospitals, hospices or any other service situation. There is a certain humility and sacrifice in this. He also is always prepared to meet any person individually, giving an example of "going out of the way." Pope Francis also notes that the work of the church is an invitation to God, that the most important role of a priest is to help the people in the way that will bring about their sanctification. He has stated that the role of the bishop or priest is to love his people and his diocese, and to love and serve Christ in them. He has spoken of the internal politics of the church, that they are not important, that bishops should listen to God rather than men. That also means that he is just simply a man and that a man can make mistakes. It is important, however, to recognize these mistakes. He has said that being a bishop or priest is not easy and that he is not a good priest and does not expect to
