Malwarebytes Anti-Malware Free version supports Windows 7 with 64-bit.DRG Class 81 The German Reichsbahn Class 81 was a class of 2-8-2 "Mogul" steam locomotives operated by the Reichsbahn. The locomotives were built by two German railway companies, the (Köf&e) of Altenbeken and Stolp-Dresden in Saxony, and the (DSB) of Dresden. They worked outstandingly in all areas of German railway operations. At the end of the Second World War, in May 1945, they still had only about a dozen engines in service, since the Soviet occupation of Germany seriously disrupted the German rail network. The locomotives of the class had a low centre of gravity and were among the most stable in their time. Their large fireboxes were therefore well suited for hauling heavy trains over long distances. During the Deutsche Reichsbahn-Gesellschaft era of the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG), the locomotives were rebuilt, with the German Deutsche Reichsbahn acquiring only 14 locomotives. These were numbered 2001-2014. To avoid confusion, the early locomotives are referred to as "K/Köf&e-Mogul" or "DSB-Mogul"; the later Class 81 locomotives are called "K/DSB-Mogul" (they were built by the Köf&e and owned by the DSB). Design and construction The locomotives were designed in 1894 by Hermann Lübke as a more powerful member of the class 81.0, 81.1, 81.2 of the previous Deutsche Reichsbahn period. In 1897 they were superseded in order by class 92.101 locomotives, and the last of the Class 81 was retired in 1926, The Class 81 was originally slated for export to the United States. However, due to the outbreak of the First World War, the U.S. demanded that no locomotives built in German or Austrian factories could leave Germany. After the end of the war, the United States still wanted to purchase rail engines from Germany, and e79caf774b
