"A software-as-a-service is a service model in which software is licensed on a subscription basis, paid for by the user rather than the vendor, and downloaded to the user's computing device as needed." The Software-as-a-Service (SaaS) category covers five main types of business models for providing a software service: Software as a service (SaaS) "SaaS comprises technologies that store, manage, and deliver computer software services over a network, typically the Internet. It is one of the fastest growing categories of the information technology industry." - Wikipedia's entry on Software-as-a-Service The oldest and most popular type of SaaS are cloud-based applications. There are other types of SaaS: One-time software purchase "The software product is sold on a one-time, or one-off, basis, i.e. the software is acquired, installed and configured on the user's computer, but is not licensed to the user. The user typically obtains the license by purchasing the software from the vendor's storefront and installing it on their computer." - Wikipedia's entry on SaaS The other types of SaaS are not cloud-based but are commonly called "Software-as-a-Service (SaaS)." An Open Source Software-as-a-Service (OSSaaS) is an online service that provides free software. "Software as a Service" (SaaS) is a business model in which software is licensed on a subscription basis, paid for by the user rather than the vendor, and downloaded to the user's computing device as needed. Many software companies have adopted SaaS as a cheaper way of delivering their software products, which in turn has created confusion about what SaaS really means. Over the years, this confusion has manifested in a variety of ways. At the time of writing, Microsoft is still selling MS Office products, at the traditional one-time purchase price, without any limitations on how users can use it. This article describes the differences between SaaS and the other types of SaaS, in a straightforward way that makes the differences between cloud-based

Spicer said that the Trump administration will be proposing a "skinny" bill, saying that there is a "real concern" that the current version could not pass the Senate. The House is scheduled to vote on the American Health Care Act as early as Wednesday. However, several Republican members of the House Freedom Caucus have indicated they will not vote for the bill as it currently stands, and Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) is facing pressure from conservatives to include changes to the current bill. "There are a lot of concerns with the bill, and so this is an ongoing effort," Spicer said. "We're going to continue to work with Congress." Spicer also told reporters that House Freedom Caucus Chairman Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) is in touch with the White House on how to fix the legislation. "It seems to me that there's not a solution if the healthcare bill is going to go through a motion," he said. "We're working on a solution. We're looking for help on how to move forward on this." Spicer added that the White House has "a sense" of what can be included in a bill. "We're trying to get to a solution and make sure the American people are in a good place with how they're being treated," ca3bfb1094

Our Christmas tree is finally down, I've been on a tear of sick for the last few days. I've been cleaning our house and getting a lot accomplished. For some reason I always have a clean house the day after Christmas, even though it's not Christmas. I'm trying to make up for it. I did manage to take the time to make this card today though. I was feeling a little lazy today and only made a baby one of those card I love. I also made some Christmas dies. They are too big for my camera but I will have to find a way to snap a picture. This week is all about die cuts, I've been working on a Christmas album for Christmas, I have a million photos to sort through. Follow me on Instagram Follow by Email Pinterest Just Imagine Liners...
