Concealer Crack + PC/Windows

Concealer is a handy and reliable application designed to protect your files by hiding them into another file. The latter is called a decoy file. The data is encrypted via AES (symmetric algorithm) using a s56 bits encryption key. The decoy file, however, remains functional. The decoy file looks normal, save for the fact it's encrypted and only concealed files can be accessed with Concealer. Click the image to read the full Concealer Review. ## What's New In Concealer?

File protection for your important files, configurable encryption key (s56) Concealer supports 2 types of encryption keys: A key manually entered, which contains the passphrase to decrypt the decoy file Beware : the decoy file is only an empty text file, nothing encrypted in it. A key automatically generated (called "unattended" configuration). Unlike the manual configuration, the key is installed by default and can be automatically encrypted/decrypted using passphrases. Since version 3.0 you can use the same, automatically generated key for encryption and decryption, this is called "automatic configuration". The encrypted decoy file can be hidden within existing files, directory, etc. and will be displayed as such. For instance, if the encrypted file is a text file that is located in the default text file location, it will be displayed as such. The default location of encrypted files is ".concealer", but you can change it from the Options menu. Concealer can encrypt data of all types, you can also use the encrypt function to replace strings with other values. Concealer Keys Manual configuration keys are specified in the keytab file with the name of the service the key belongs to. The service will be identified by an uppercase text (PID) followed by a colon and the name of the service (Example: PID:foobar:decrypt). The key's password is specified in the keytab file with the name of the service the key belongs to and the name of the key. The password is prefixed with an asterisk (Example: key:foobar:password*). To enable encryption for one key, mark the corresponding line in the keytab file "true". A safer way to enable or disable encryption is to disable the corresponding service (PID). There are three methods for generating the passphrase, see the "Passphrase to use" setting on the Options menu. If the passphrase is manually entered, it must be unique. To ensure uniqueness, the list of passphrases is displayed on the Options menu. If an existing passphrase matches the passed one, it will be automatically updated. Unattended configuration : If you're using a tool to install your key, such as unattended-conf, you can use the respective tool to encrypt the decoy file, it can be done through the menu
