Q: What is the difference between Hibernate Session.flush and Session.close? I'm looking at the code in hibernate-core (v3.6). In the code I found the following session methods: public void flush() public void close() public void restore()
What's the difference between them? And how can you tell which one to call, for example, in an application? A: Flush means making sure all state in the session object is flushed to the underlying DB. Close closes the connection. In the case of session bound beans, the backing session should be flushed after loading, passing the DAO, in order to make sure the session ends in a state that is correct even if an error occurs in the DAO. The session should also be closed after that point, in order to prevent the session from leaking state information. As to the question of which method to use, it is certainly better to call flush.close rather than close, but it depends on what you are doing and what exceptions are thrown. flush would preserve your original detached state. close would prevent persistence. A: Hibernate Sessions Flush or commit session. "Flush" here means to make sure your session state is consistent with your transaction state, and to put your session state (such as current/transaction state, dirty state, etc.) onto the database in order to be persistent. "Commit" here means to commit the dirty state, if any, to the underlying database. Why Flushing You can flush the session if you want to persist the state of your objects and that state is not part of the default transaction. If you don't flush the session, the state of your objects may be lost. Also, the underlying database might be lost, if you delete them. Why Committing Generally, you only commit the session if you need to persist the state of your objects. The state of your objects may have come from other sessions, so it would be inappropriate to delete data that was generated through those other sessions. Implementation Notes It's important to note that you don't have to explicitly commit the transaction. Hibernate will still put the commit command onto the underlying connection

What's New In?

Fracture incidence among patients with septic arthritis of the hip treated with open or closed treatment. To compare the incidence of new, displaced fractures following conservative management of septic arthritis of the hip between two treatment groups. This was a retrospective study of a community-based cohort of patients who were treated for septic arthritis of the hip between 1997 and 2001. All patients were treated with a minimum of 4 weeks of indomethacin as a single agent or in combination with a cephalosporin. Those patients who were initially treated with only indomethacin were divided into 2 groups: open or closed treatment. Demographic data, treatment regimen and incidence of new fractures were recorded. Fracture data were verified by radiology report and review of fracture notes. As the number of fractures at follow-up was small, a logistic regression was also used to assess the risk of fracture between the treatment groups. Thirty-four patients were treated with open and 57 patients were treated with closed treatment. All patients showed complete resolution of clinical symptoms on indomethacin and those patients initially treated with only indomethacin were considered as the treatment group. The incidence of new, displaced fractures was significantly higher in the closed treatment group (7 fractures in 36 patients, 18.9%) when compared to the open treatment group (1 fracture in 22 patients, 4.6%) ($P = 0.038$). Logistic regression analysis showed that the incidence of new, displaced fractures was almost 9 times greater in the closed treatment group (95% confidence interval 2.35-36.49). The majority of fractures in both treatment groups were treated conservatively. The incidence of new, displaced fractures was approximately twice as high in the closed treatment group when compared to the open treatment group. The risk of fractures in the closed treatment group was almost 9 times higher than in the open treatment group.
