Usefulness of isolated extracranial carotid artery involvement in the evaluation of patients with high-risk of cerebrovascular disease. Intracranial carotid artery disease is a major concern in patients with arterial hypertension. The latter is a possible risk factor for the incidence of cerebrovascular events. Isolated extracranial carotid artery atherosclerosis is frequently associated with intracranial atherosclerotic disease, but it is unknown whether it is a predictor of cerebrovascular disease. Sixty-three consecutive patients with isolated extracranial carotid artery stenosis were evaluated and compared with sixty-three patients with asymptomatic intracranial carotid artery disease (ICAD). All patients had $\geq 50\%$ stenosis of the external carotid artery (ECA) and of the common carotid artery (CCA), whereas those with $\geq 70\%$ stenosis of the internal carotid artery were considered to have ICAD. The prevalence of hypertension, cardiovascular risk factors, and other traditional risk factors was comparable in the two groups. The ECA was found to be the single most frequent location of atherosclerotic lesions. In patients with isolated extracranial carotid artery disease, hypertension was present in 70% of the patients;

45% had a history of smoking; 36% of them had suffered a previous cerebrovascular event. In patients with ICAD, the presence of multiple risk factors was significantly more frequent and the incidence of prior cerebrovascular disease was significantly greater than in
