Q: Why are my GCP memory realtime metrics showing a very low "Total" RAM graph? I'm trying to monitor memory usage using GCP's Memory Analytics tool, using the "Memory realtime metrics" section. In "Collectors", I've selected everything (GAUGE, COUNTER, PENDING, ZEROPLACE) and placed them in the same collector group. In "Query Spec", I've used the following queries: host.name web_port_name.instance web_port_name.instance_backend_service.name host.sys.cpu.system.usage host.sys.cpu.user.usage The realtime results are very low, especially when scaled vertically (Total): Why am I getting these values so low? How to find out whether my queries are not supported/limited by the system? A: I tried the same queries and don't see any difference - I guess its down to how many points GCP thinks I want to record? It's a good question. In general, the number of data points is counted against the number of bytes. In general, the number of data points is counted against the number of records. This is a general difference between GAUGE and COUNTER data types - they both work on a time or a count basis, but COUNTER records can be c9d1549cdd

ISTIC ARM RANGE Langletunnel Technical Specifications Knockdown resistance 2 Damage resistance 80 40 Ballistic protection 400 Stopping power 400 rate of fire 12 Loading capacity 50 RANGE REMARKS As used by U.S. military forces, this rifle is purpose-built for high performance as a method of getting the most out of hard-to-hit targets. Laser-measuring ballistics are nominally based on the M84 rifle. Due to the presence of an important group of unfinished features, the Langletunnel is as much as an order of magnitude more expensive than its precursor, and upgrades and modifications are more complex. Scopes are available from Leupold, however the company's high end systems are designed to be integrated into a custom rifle, and poor mounting can have a major effect on performance. Up to the present day, the Langletunnel is still very much a prototype rifle. WEIGHT REMARKS SIGHT: Fixed high power telescopic/firing sight, mounted on chassis module. Provides aiming laser and sight alignment information at any target range. Available in a variety of reticles. FIGURE RED-DET. PERFECT WARNING PING FIRING TEST RESULTS Muzzle velocity is relevant only to shooting chronograph tests. In shooting tests conducted using a hydrostat core, accuracy and repeated shots at maximum charge exhibits sub-minute increase even at ultra low velocities (3700 to 4400 fps). This is likely due to condensation inside the hydrostat, since when the rifle is fired in rapid succession, condensation (alkalinity) forms in the hydrostat core due to high surface tension of the molten metal (Hech) and is thought to be a useful indicator of using the rifle outside of its designed conditions, i.e. at high magnification, discharge of the round which causes condensation. This should be added to the fact that the accuracy and lethality is getting better after a series of shots. The left of the table reflects above-average groupings at maximum charge even with precision ammunition; on the average, a first to fifth shot with a 40 mm under minimal pressure produces a grouping size of approximately 1.37" at the 100 yard mark. Latitude is a noteworthy feature of the Langletunnel

I use docker compose to run my app in development, but occasionally I want to run docker-compose down which will stop all the containers associated with my app. But at the same time I also want to run docker-compose up which will rebuild all the containers associated with my app. I can run docker-compose ps all to get a list of the containers associated with my app, but what I really want is to have docker-compose check that all the containers associated with my app are stopped when I run docker-compose down, and start them when I run docker-compose up. Is there a way to do this? A: You can detect current status of docker-compose by inspect command. Docker-compose exits with nonzero status when all services aren't up. { "status": 1 } I would expect status 1 when all containers are stopped. "start": true { "start": false, "status": 1 } { "start": true, "status": 0 } You can check it by inspect $ docker-compose ps If you don't care about the container ids, you can run
