I am writing code for my first major project. So far, I have been writing, for the most part, straight C and a bit of Pascal and some other languages. Obviously, in C, I am writing straight machine code in the simplest terms. In Pascal, I am writing to the PC for a simple environment, where I am only dealing with a few hundred bytes of memory. In other languages, such as .NET and Java, I'm using a scripting language which is more abstract and doesn't usually require me to actually write in machine code. My primary skill with programming is in C. I am also comfortable with assembly. For the past few days, I have been learning Python and am very excited about it. But... I have been doing the Cython wrapper to try to teach myself "faster C" as they say. So, when I thought I was learning Python, I was learning how to write C. From everything I've read, I've learned that Python is just a very fast interpreter of C. But I am missing the best part - the built in object oriented data structures. So, should I stay with Python and add data structures to my toolbox? Or should I stay with C and simply learn to program that way and get around Python in terms of speed? I started learning Python several years ago, but had an old 1.5Ghz G4 running OS X with 16 Mb of RAM. So, my only options were to either learn C or to learn how to program in Python and process that way.
