What's new in Project Tarvotan:

Arc/weather predictive service launched in Chennai We at Periyar associate, forecasters Tamil Nadu rarely has a good monsoon, even the strongest of them, like 1976, 1983 and 1989, can be called 'poor'. The state gets most of its rainfall from the Western Ghats, and it tends to recede with advancing the southwest monsoon season. Hence the state often has an unusual mix of monsoons — strong cyclonic systems off the Arabian sea, interspersed with relatively meagre rains in the southern parts.

Historically, too, the south of India, especially Tamil Nadu, was no stranger to severe drought. And if it is the forecast rainfall, the state could, once again, demand a return of fortunes. A major reason for many drought-hit regions of India, from the Rajasthan desert belt to water scarce states like West Bengal, is the impact of climate change. Since more than 50 per cent of Tamil Nadu's annual rainfall is coming from the southwest monsoon, the prospect of no rains anywhere for 10 to 12 days, with 'before' normal rainfall, makes the entire state vulnerable to water shortages. This year, though, it is likely that Periyar Katchi, the iconic party founded by actor-turned-politician, M.G. Ramachandran, will put forward a political platform on climate change, which could further prove to be a game changer. Interestingly, the Periyar associate, forecasters, may also provide better and more reliable data, and an assured logistics for those monitoring the weather. Advertisement For either the state government, the Central Meteorological Department

(CMD) or the public at large, some forecasting challenges remained. The state CMD's forecasts, for example, delivered by satellite rainscoring, remain highly uncertain, and too many meteorologists, from Andhra Pradesh and Maharashtra to Karnataka, prefer topographic gauges, which have a proved record of over 90 per cent accuracy. Commenting on the state's uncertain climate, south asian meteorologist and a long-standing associate of Periyar associate, Rohit Pawar, puts it succinctly — 'too much hot and too dry'. "There is a constant mild unpredictability in what the monsoon is going to do — it may be very strong one year and next year
