In silico prediction of oligosaccharide modifications for glycoproteins. The observation that glycoproteins can be heavily modified by oligosaccharide is not new. Nevertheless, the identification and characterization of some glycan structures on recombinant glycoproteins is still challenging. The bottleneck lies in the steps prior to the isolation of the oligosaccharides: the separation from other glycan and polypeptide sequences, their detection and identification, and their functional characterization. For this purpose the method used must be well defined. Reliable data to inform the optimization of the purification and detection procedures must be of high value to ensure reproducibility and robustness of detection. The in silico prediction of glycan structures prior to the experimental investigation of glycoproteins is feasible using glycan array technology. On the same time, the conformation of glycan-protein is also of crucial importance to be evaluated. Such advance would also contribute to the understanding of the interactions between glycans and glycoproteins. President Obama addressed an audience at the White House today, giving an update on the US economy and preparing his audience for upcoming recess. He reiterated his defense of the health care reform effort in the face of some opposition, called on Congress to extend the Bush tax cuts, discussed the Egyptian crisis, and apologized for a "transition mis-spent" from the previous administration. He called for early action on extending the Bush tax cuts and mentioned that, "I understand the fiscal cliff that we're moving towards. And so any revenue that we have to add back to the Social Security system...you know the math works. We'll keep going through this discussion in the context of those issues." He avoided full-scale combat over the president's health care reform effort, and stopped short of explicitly saying the law should be repealed, instead affirming that the approach is one of "moving forward" and suggesting it is best to leave to the new president to make a judgement one way or the other. "I'm happy to have a debate about how to best achieve this goal of prevention and expanded coverage," he said. "The approach we took was to focus first on something we knew would provide
