Check Your Delivery Options Identification of B-cell lymphoma during neoadjuvant treatment is essential for chemotherapy response assessment. The current study aim to evaluate the prevalence of lymphoma during neoadjuvant chemotherapy (NAC) in patients with stage II/III ovarian cancer. Results: The prevalence of lymphoma during NAC was 10.9% (11/102) and six lymphomas were found before NAC. None of the patients had subclinical B-cell lymphoma. Five lymphomas were diagnosed on pathologic lymph node dissection (PLND) after NAC and none were diagnosed during surgery. Patients with lymphomas diagnosed on PLND had larger tumor size, higher CA-125 level, higher NAC response rate, and higher prevalence of stage III disease at the time of diagnosis. In contrast, patients without PLND had lower tumor size and higher NAC response rate. The difference in NAC response rate between patients with and without PLND was significant ($p=0.001$). Conclusion: Lymphomas are found during NAC in a substantial number of patients with ovarian cancer and PLND is valuable for the detection of lymphoma.
