What's new:

plane Astral Spaceplane (ASP), first proposed by E.E. "Doc" Hautman in 1948 is described in his papers and also some biographies as a full-sized flying saucer that could take off and land vertically like a regular airplane and use its eight wings to fly smoothly and fast like a typical airplane, the material for those wings consisting of krypton based "anti-grav" rays E.E. Hautman intended for Hautman to build a prototype of that flying saucer called the ASP (which he never did). The materials were purchased in October 1951 from TRW Laboratories of Redlands, California, and involved a total cost of nearly $3 million. Even though ASP's were built (5) by Hautman for the Air Force project, the bodies were never used by the Air Force and even though the ASP's were built 3 years before the United States Government initiated the Air Force's X-20 Dyna-Soar program, William Beebe disagreed with Hautman's ideas of using the ASP's for flying saucers. The ASP's were built by Hautman to test the effects of anti-gravity on human beings. The ASP's were not built by Hautman in a flying saucer shape, they were built with a metallic craft with aircraft characteristics that could take off vertically like a flying saucer, that could fly in the air and that could land on a runway like a regular airplane. When ASP landed, it would slow down and come to a stop as usual. Hautman published about ASP in the December 2nd, 1951 publication of Popular Science titled "A New Weapon for the Air Force" Shocked by the level of constructivist fervor in Hautman's proposal and also the degree of bluster and bombast in his publication, the Air Force had him investigated by group of test pilots. Beebe, the managing editor of Popular Science who had been working on Hautman's proposals for the air force, wrote letters to the editor of Popular Science asking it to steer Hautman away from project ASP. As a result Beebe and Hautman worked together to construct a model "flying saucer" and test its performance. Even though ASP was constructed like an airplane rather than like a flying saucer, it was built at a rapid pace with a high level of technical expertise, and also it was the first flying saucer ever built. The government bought the Hautman Company in 1953 for
