What's new in The Seven Deadly Seas:

The Seven Deadly Seas were seven archaeological ocean locations mentioned in an ancient Chinese tradition. The tradition is that these sites are buried under seven mountains on the isle of Haoshen, which in fact is the southern coast of Hainan Island, China. Theories about the origin of the tradition are split between it being a later development and a pre-Confucius artifact from the Zhou period. Sites considered by many archaeologists to be on the isle of Haoshen are Songyang Mound on Wuzhi Island, Chu City, and Haizhou Bay. History of the seven mountains According to the Zuozhuan, the tradition of the seven mountains only dates back to the age of Confucius, though several aspects of the tradition, such as the number seven, seem to be his invention. At the time of the Zhou dynasty (1046-256 BCE), the kingdom of Yue defeated a neighboring state. Yu the Great (r.2346-2266 BCE) completed the construction of the Kong family tombs in the area of Liuchao Village near Wuzhi Island. Three of the seven mountains are named after members of the Kong family—Songyang, Jiutian, and Shanghuai. A very different list of seven places to bury temples was recovered from the Shijiahe culture of the Guizhou Terrace from 4800-3300 BCE. The sites formed a "cloud temple" along a mountain on the western edge of the Guiyang Basin. Shijiahe culture was locally recognized as early as the Zhou period before being rediscovered in 2004. This is one of the oldest civilizations in modern China, greatly predating other regional cultures of the period. In Shijiahe culture, the burials were possibly used in conjunction with the offering of tigers, which were buried separately. Although the Shijiahe and northern Guizhou Basin civilizations used the same shaped graves, the gods and rites were different.
