Immunohistochemical study of the expression of fibronectin in splenic natural killer cells. The local distribution of fibronectin in normal spleen cells was examined by immunofluorescence and immunoperoxidase methods. It was observed that fibronectin was associated with natural killer cells (NK1.1+) and asialo GM1+ cells. Natural killer cells (NK1.1+) were more numerous in lymph nodes and spleen, and had higher fibronectin content than the other cells in spleen. The immunoperoxidase staining for fibronectin correlated with the immunofluorescence pattern, and showed that fibronectin is synthesized by cells in the marginal zone and red pulp. Experiments carried out in vivo in mice and ex vivo in spleen slices showed that fibronectin was synthesized mainly in NK1.1+ and asialo GM1+ cells. The expression of fibronectin in natural killer cells could suggest a direct influence of this protein in the interaction with fibroblasts, since fibronectin may facilitate the adhesion of natural killer cells to stroma. go big or go home. MGA: This is a pretty big move for Microsoft, what do you think they get from it? JC: Microsoft gets a lot of things from it. One, obviously this is good PR, as I've mentioned, for them. It certainly does some good things for them, namely getting the game out there to the mass market, which has been lacking. The next part of it will be cheaper devices coming into the market, because they are going to run off the x86 architecture. So when you start to look at the netbook market, it's all about Windows. They get a lot of things, they get a lot of things from the Kindle. MGA: What's your final assessment of Amazon and the Kindle? JC: I think Amazon is going to be fine, because they have the market cornered. I think the Kindle is going to be fine,
