In late 2017, EA Sports introduced a similar feature called "Playbook," which used the data collected during a real-life athlete playing in the motion capture suit to drive a number of gameplay variables, including player attributes, save performance, skill execution, dribbling ability, stamina, and more. Both HyperMotion and Playbook feature the same user interface, and utilize the same underlying physics. We've written a white paper on this subject that details the creation of this technology and how we've integrated motion capture into the FIFA development workflow. At a high level, and broken down into steps, a typical HyperMotion user session begins with motion capture data capturing the play of the current athlete in the motion capture suit. This data is used to drive the physics of the player, resulting in realistic player movement and agent physics. Next, a second capture is made of the movements of another athlete in the motion capture suit. Using the player's captured motion and the data from the second athlete's data, EA Sports creates a match using the gameplay engine to test the motion capture technology. In some instances, results from multiple captures can be used to find the best match. Additionally, sometimes an athlete will be able to make a mark that provides some essential data needed to create a HyperMotion session. Once the best match is determined, a user session begins using the data captured from that match. "Combining our in-house motion capture, motion capture data from other players and data from a match allows us to create a match with the data that best replicates the play of that player," said Matthew Wright, World and Developer Lead for motion capture at EA Sports. "We look at past matches that the player has recorded, see how he has played and how he has done on those. We're able to get a feel for how well the data translates. We look at how his characteristics have changed over the years and use that to adjust the data and the generation process to make a match that's as accurate as possible." This next step is key. The best HyperMotion sessions are when the player's movements are being simulated as accurately as possible. "Some of the best matches we've had have been ones where the athlete looks completely and totally different from how they do in a real game," Wright said. "If we have a player whose movement is completely different and still looks great, we are confident in our technology. If the player has minor details that are different,
