Naming a global governance crisis. Globalization theory has been influential in conceptualizing governance within the planetary framework of the contemporary world system. Yet, no theoretical underpinning legitimizes its claim to global governance, which seems to be a more recent and not uncontroversial phenomenon. This paper questions whether the concept of governance can adequately account for the transformations of the world system in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. It explains that the focus of globalization theory has been in highlighting the role of social actors in a mode of inter-relationship on the basis of contractual arrangements. Yet, without being aware of it, the theory of governance, which originated in political science and international relations (IR) theory, does not reflect the shift of the world system from production to consumption. In contrast to that, a change toward governance theory is indicated here by the conceptualization of the world system as one based on ongoing governance and as a form of political governance-a new global form of governance. This will present the notion of global governance as a new global form of governance in the context of global governance crisis.Ubuntu $9.99 Back to Top! $9.99 Notify me when this product is available: The default icon for this item will be the stock
