after ECTA officials became aware of it, but was not disclosed until the first week of June. The flaw in ECTA's web site allowed attackers to exploit users of its website via a clickjacking attack, e-mailing them an HTML file that contained a link to a fake web site. The fake site was hosted on the ECTA's web server, and looked exactly like the legitimate site, with the exception of a large, friendly "Hi" at the top of the page. The fake site asked users for their user name and password and then tried to log them in to the fake site
