The solid-liquid interface in a biological liquid is usually referred to as the membrane. Membranes are the active part of a cell that has a unique structure and property which is very different from the interface in the liquid. Biological membranes consist of a hydrophobic matrix into which proteins are embedded. This matrix is mostly composed of phospholipids that are much more rigid than aqueous solutions. Because of the rigid nature of the matrix, it provides a barrier which prevents small particles and large ions from penetrating into the cell. Membranes are usually classified into two main types. These are the type 1 membranes which is formed by the lipids present in the cell, and the type 2 membranes which is a lipid bilayer enclosed by a protein, and is characterized by a large mismatch between the thickness of the lipid and the thickness of the protein. Many researches have been conducted to analyze the formation of the membrane at the region of an electrolyte-cantilever interface. In 1961 a theoretical study was done based on the interaction between the cell membrane and a liquid interface by Malinsky, et al., Phys. Rev. B., volume 10, number 7, page 1762-1764, 1960. Malinsky has shown that the intrinsic physico-chemical properties of the cell membrane are responsible for inhibiting the diffusion of small ions and large charged particles from the electrolyte. They have concluded that the effect of the cell membrane on the transport phenomena is similar 6d1f23a050
