Opposing Fronts, was really pleased to see that we are able to offer a.Q: How to read a large file with multiple entries I have a CSV file that I've created from an external source (it's part of an online survey system). The file I have is really long and contains about 800 entries. They are long strings, like this one: state:SC,city:Columbia,address:335 Poplar Street My question is, how can I (or which would be easier, if it's available) read this file in R so that I can work with it? The file has three columns and 854 rows. My first thought would be to have something like this: read.csv(file="data.csv", sep = ",", header=TRUE) That almost works... but only for one item (see the reproducible example below). I thought I'd be able to read the file like this: read.csv(file="data.csv", sep = ",", header=TRUE, fill = TRUE) A: I'm assuming that the strings in your csv file are separated by a comma, and that each string is only a few lines long (though I'm not sure why you'd want to do this in the first place). If this is the case, then your data could look like this: data.csv state:SC,city:Columbia,address:335 Poplar Street state:SC,city:Columbia,address:335 Poplar Street state:SC,city:Columbia,address:335 Poplar Street You can read it in like this

Every year, the news media gives more attention to mental health issues than it does to all the other health problems in our society combined. And in recent years, the news media's interest has been far outdistancing that of government agencies. This myopic focus on mental health has serious policy consequences. Mental health is a "soft" topic, with people having different views on what their problems are and what the best treatments are. The media can help, but its influence tends to be greater when mental disorders are highlighted in particular cases (and when those who talk about mental health have some sort of special training). So can there be a "mental health industry" or is it, as the journalist and broadcaster Charles Leadbeater says, the "world of psychics, snake-handlers and psychokinesis"? Yes, it's the world of psychics and paranormalists that makes a lot of money out of mental health, but it's also where the psychological profession (which was established in the 19th century) goes to learn about its subject. My great-great-grandfather was the professional head of the British Psychical Research Society, which funded many valuable studies into the powers of mediums. However, there are other sides to the industry, so are the "mental health industry" and its practitioners all frauds and charlatans? At a recent exhibition in London, mental health had a prominent position. This, however, was not in the form of organised support groups, for mental health, but mental health-themed arts projects, including a show with a giant model of a brain. The exhibition, which was curated by Anna Blomstedt, seems to have been a way 6d1f23a050
