If the C++ library I'm writing uses a specific gcc implementation (and the rest of the code runs just fine on other compilers like clang and msvc), can I still claim that the library is portable to other compilers? For example if the library uses std::string, is it portable to other compilers? If it does not, how should I write a library so that I can say it's portable? A: By default, your library should be portable. Each C++ library has a standard-compliant ABI, and your library should use standard-compliant functions for the basic functionality required by your library (e.g. standard string functions
