She spoke at the State Department on Friday, a day after the United Nations Security Council took a vote on a report to determine whether Iran was abiding by a U.N. demand to refrain from further nuclear work. Clinton said the U.S. would try to keep dialogue with Iran and North Korea going. "There is no more important challenge than dealing with Iran. There is no more urgent challenge, and I still believe that when it comes to the nuclear issue, the best outcome of this debate is a diplomatic outcome," she said. Clinton said Iran continued to defy U.S. demands to cease enrichment, saying sanctions must not be lifted unless Iran changes its behavior. The United States and other Western nations say Iran wants the nuclear material for an atomic weapon. Iran says it wants the materials for energy. Under the auspices of the IAEA, a report on Monday by IAEA members found that Iran had continued to enrich its uranium, and said the country had failed to provide "credible assurance" that it would not use its nuclear material to build a weapon. Mottaki, one of Iran's most senior diplomats, has said that if the Security Council does not adopt the panel's findings and impose new sanctions on Iran, Iran would deploy missiles on the Mediterranean coast and close the Strait of Hormuz to attack oil tankers. Iran's Foreign Ministry called on the Security Council on Monday to consider whether sanctions are "within its competence" before imposing any new measures. The Security Council was going to debate a resolution drafted by the United States and Britain that calls for Iran to suspend all enrichment of uranium and remove its existing stockpile by November, replacing it with low-level uranium. Russia and China are concerned the resolution could trigger a new round of sanctions that could stifle the global economy. Clinton said that the U.N. should consider "all kinds of tools" to deal with Iran's nuclear program, including sanctions. "We have to be very realistic about what we can achieve in this next round of discussions."
