The Social Democratic Party (SPD) is considering forming a junior coalition with the right-wing Alternative for Germany (AfD), reports Die Zeit. The latest edition of the German daily newspaper on Friday quotes a senior SPD member who says the social democrats would also be open to other options like a governing alliance with the Free Democratic Party (FDP), whose support for former eurozone executive Angela Merkel is waning. Read more: What 'AfD wants to be' in a Merkel/Weil coalition The German chancellor was booted out of office in federal elections last month with her Christian Democrats (CDU) gaining a smaller percentage of the vote than in 2013. The conservatives are polling in fourth place with 23.5 percent of the vote, according to a poll by newspaper Süddeutsche Zeitung on Tuesday. Merkel's Christian Democrats are still expected to lead a grand coalition of liberals, the SPD and the pro-business Free Democrats (FDP), which this week failed to secure parliamentary backing after right-wing and left-wing rebels tabled a no-confidence motion against FDP leader Christian Lindner. Watch video 01:44 Share Merkel and the AfD Send Facebook google+ Whatsapp Tumblr linkedin stumble Digg reddit Newsvine Permalink How the AfD plans to make its mark on German politics The SPD is now preparing for a possible vote of no-confidence in Merkel's government. But some of its leaders remain staunchly opposed to coalition talks with the right-wing party. A voting majority is needed for such a move in parliament and the party is of a mind to support a motion of no confidence in the government. A defeat of the SPD would then leave the main force in German politics
