abnormalities in children with Tourette syndrome: evidence for an activation of the central noradrenergic system by a dysfunction of the serotonin system? In addition to a disordered serotonergic system, there is evidence for an alteration of the dopaminergic system in Tourette syndrome (TS). However, results from experimental studies in animals have indicated that the dopamine system is not causally involved in the pathogenesis of the disorder. In the present study a transcranial sonographic evaluation of brain structures in TS children and their matched controls revealed a significantly smaller left-sided cerebral blood flow velocity in the middle cerebral artery in TS patients. The difference was present even when differences in body size were statistically controlled. Only TS patients with a comorbid disorder of ADHD had a significantly reduced cerebral blood flow velocity. These data provide evidence for an altered dopaminergic system in children with TS that might lead to an altered noradrenergic output from the central noradrenergic system./* NSRunLoop.h Copyright (c) 1996-2009, Apple Inc.
