Electroacupuncture inhibits gastroprotective activity via nitric oxide-independent pathways in the stomach of rats. Electroacupuncture (EA) regulates gastric motility and reflexes, thereby improving visceral sensation and enhancing gastrointestinal functions. However, the mechanisms of action of EA on gastric functions remain unclear. We thus investigated whether the effects of EA on gastric functions were mediated through the nitric oxide (NO) system. We also investigated whether EA treatment could modify the release of gastric vasoactive peptides in response to stress. Gastric secretion was measured for a 3 h period in conscious non-operated and adrenalectomized rats. EA was applied to the gastrocnemius muscle after transcutaneous electrical stimulation was delivered to the skin over the muscle. Gastric motility was observed as rhythmic contractions in conscious non-operated and after pylorus ligation-operated rats. The gastric response 6d1f23a050
