I have a function which allocates memory to store a list of data which can be filled in its calls, and then it calls itself recursively. Here is a simplified example of my function. int alloc(uint32_t* data, uint32_t size) { if (size > 0) { data = (uint32_t*) malloc(size); if (data == NULL) return -1; } return 0; } If I run it for small data I don't have any problem. For example: uint32_t data[] = {1, 2, 3, 4}; size_t n = sizeof(data) / sizeof(data[0]); alloc(data, n); This will fail as sizeof(data) does not include the null terminator. When I try to run it for a list that contains a NULL pointer it will allocate enough memory but then will try to free it, causing a free memory leak. uint32_t data[] = {1, NULL, 2, 3}; size_t n = sizeof(data) / sizeof(data[0]); alloc(data, n); I think that what happens is the alloc function would allocate on the stack for the original array. It would be allocated on the heap and when it tries to free that stack memory, it causes a segmentation fault. Is that right? And then what I don't understand is why the following works: uint32_t data[] = {1, NULL, 2, NULL
