The president was referring to Corey Myers, an 18-year-old Florida high school student who was sentenced to life in prison for fatally shooting classmate Rachel Hoffman. Hoffman, a 17-year-old senior, was walking to her last class at Orange County High School in May 2009 when she was shot and killed. "That should not have been your last class," Obama said. "It's a sacrifice a parent should make, not a teenager. It's a sacrifice that should be made by a community, not an individual." Obama praised Florida's "remarkable people," including law enforcement officials, for responding quickly to the shooting and expressing sympathy for Hoffman's family. He said violent acts of crime are a scourge on society and that his administration will continue to work with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and local authorities to develop new ways to prevent and deter them. "The first step is ensuring that we use all the tools that we have available to keep our communities safe," he said. "We need to use the investigative tools we have so that the perpetrators are brought to justice and so that families and friends can grieve and can move forward." c6a93da74d
