Exotoxin-producing Escherichia coli O157:H7 (ExoU) is a major toxin involved in severe diarrhea and hemolytic uremic syndrome, and detection of this toxin in clinical strains may provide a diagnostic tool. Thus, it is important to accurately detect exotoxins. One crucial element for accurate detection of exotoxins is a sensitive and easy to handle assay. This study was carried out to determine whether the outcome of peritonitis in mice infected with plasmid-mediated ExoU could be monitored through the expression of ExoU. A plasmid that encoded a chaperone for the production of ExoU was successfully constructed and its effect on the outcome of mouse peritonitis was verified by its influence on the expression of ExoU. Results showed that ExoU expression was significantly reduced in a plasm c6a93da74d
