that is actually true. the fear of failing or not doing enough is very strong when trying to just have fun and take the pressure away. i know that it will all start to melt away when i am comfortable with the idea. thank you so much for your thoughts. i like how you said that as long as it's about being comfortable with your art. i can understand that very much. i think we all think our own thoughts and in the end it is our own work. i know i thought i would be better than i am but that is okay. i started a little project a while back and was able to get a few people interested. it has gotten bigger and more actual work was involved. you are welcome. maybe it could be a good support group for you. i am sure that would help if you get a day that your nerves have cleared out and that you could use a support group. i might actually start that as we get into the writing. i am always looking for good content for the podcast. i bought an ultrastrong neon green ocelot because the fact that it had the longest rattles made it a unicorn. it had one flaw though..it had a tiny newborn which made the constant shaking of the rattles absolutely impossible. i had to take the baby ocelot back and eventually ended up with a pointy-eared grey mouse. coming from a fighting game background, i was really excited to see a racing game have these mechanics. it gets you to try out different speed boosting techniques, etc. instead of just relying on fancy team colors, or more exotic vehicles, you're forced to adapt to multiple scenarios. there's a melee combat mechanic (upgrade, hold down boost, and a swipe attack) where you can take out opponents during rushes. combos make your car faster by upgrading the boost gauge or doing more damage to opponents, but you can only do up to three or four at a time.
