potency is a logarithmic measure of the number of molecules of the original medicine per liter of water in the mother, an ultrahigh dilution of the original substance. this is called a mass of the medicine. a mass is expressed in parts per billion (ppb), but the microgram (mcg) is more commonly used in research or in therapeutic and palliative practice. the potency of a homeopathic medicine is determined by the level of dilution of the mother at which the medicine is prepared, such as 14c, 30c, 200c, or 300c. from this logarithmic ratio of the mass of the original medicine to that of the ultrahigh dilution, 1 part of the original medicine is equal to the mass of the original medicine in 1 millionth of a milliliter of water. this case report describes a response to homeopathic treatment in a patient with moderate add, for whom conventional psychotropic drugs were ineffective. at the onset of the disease, a patient with severe add misdiagnosed as major depression followed by a suicide attempt visited the emergency room. she was diagnosed as having major depression and started treatment with four conventional drugs and two antidepressants. after 10 days, despite the initial improvement, the patient relapsed. in this context, she visited a general practitioner with prescribing preferences for homeopathy and had a consultation after 6 months and started homeopathic treatment by her gp. she stopped taking psychotropic drugs and took two homeopathic treatments (a 30c and a 60c) and became symptom-free in 7 days. however, the patient was discharged from the service with a diagnosis of major depression, so homeopathy was not regarded as an adjuvant psychotropic treatment.
