Brière and Sanislow (1993), for example, examined the influence of psychosocial factors on the risk of recidivism among three groups of offenders: juveniles with conduct disorder (CD), juvenile recidivists (addicted offenders), and adult recidivists. They found that the positive psychosocial environment (subjective well-being, self-perception, self-esteem, mastery motivation, and happiness) reduced the likelihood of juvenile recidivism for all groups of offenders. The results of this study are in line with several previous empirical studies showing that antisocial behavior and delinquent activity are a function of the strength and balance of positive and negative reinforcement in specific life contexts [59 61]. In support of the model's hypotheses, we also found that fearlessness, engagement, and agency were protective factors for the likelihood of recidivism and that risk factors (psychopathic tendencies) were associated with the likelihood of recidivism. We found similar patterns of risk and protective factors for recidivism among youth who were involved in this study and children who have been followed since age 7. In the present study, our hypotheses were upheld. Although we did not specifically examine mediating roles, we found that these factors (including fearlessness, engagement, agency, and agency motivation) and psychopathy mediated the relation between positive psychosocial factors and future delinquent activity. The evidence of stronger risk and protective factors in adolescents who later committed serious offenses is in line with a recent study that showed that, after 3 months of treatment, adolescents who committed physical aggression were more likely to be in at-risk situations such as peer rejection and substance use. The results showed that the degree of risk in these adolescents was predicted by intensity of aggression [6]. Our study extends the findings of Brière and Sanislow (1993) by showing that stable and even elevating levels of positive psychosocial conditions in childhood may be protective against the likelihood of having committed serious offenses in adulthood.

Introduction To Abnormal Child And Adolescent Psychology.epub

abnormal child and adolescent psychology is a comprehensive introduction to the field. it covers theoretical and methodological foundations and examines the characteristics, epidemiology, etiology, developmental course, assessment, and treatment of disorders of childhood and adolescence. at the heart of the text is the partnership of the developmental psychopathology perspective, which analyzes problems of youth within a developmental context, and a traditional clinical/disorder approach, which underscores the symptoms, causes, and treatments of disorders. woven throughout the text is the view that behavior stems from the continuous interaction of multiple influences, that the problems of the young are intricately tied to their social and cultural contexts, and that empirical approaches and the scientific method provide the best avenue for understanding the complexity of human behavior. in recent years, the prevalence of unaccompanied refugee minors (urms) in europe has increased and not much research has been carried out in the area of quantifying the psychological problems facing such minors. the aim of this study is to assess whether urms have more emotional and behavioral difficulties than italian children and if there were any significant differences in psychological problems comparing urms who come from different countries. the urm group, composed of 98 males aged 11-17 years, was compared with 103 italian adolescents aged 12-17 years. chen-teo [23] is a graduate of the psychiatry residency at the university of minnesota and a graduate of the faculty of medicine at the university of hong kong. she completed her phd in psychiatry at the university of minnesota and has been in private practice in minneapolis for the past four years. she is currently the assistant clinical professor of psychiatry at the university of minnesota and an assistant clinical professor of psychiatry at the university of hong kong. she is a certified child and adolescent psychiatrist, specializing in childhood depression. her research interests include child and adolescent psychiatry, mood disorders, psychopharmacology, and treatments. her work has been published in the journal of the american academy of child and adolescent psychiatry, the
