Many older players are familiar with the low register of the trumpet. However, over the years, I have noticed that younger players have begun to move to the low register of the trumpet with increasing regularity. This is one of the reasons why it is important for every musician to know the register of the instrument. It is important to understand that the low register on the trumpet is approximately 8DC below middle C, and this can be quite a stretch down for young players, as the low register has a very different sound from that of the higher register. The low register is a wide open instrument and is best played in a penetrating manner. When the player pulls back the bell, the first initial indication of the tone is often as a descending note. If one has a good ear for listening to the way the lower register sounds, it can be easier to develop a sound that is in sync with the lower register. With all practice, the sounds of the three registers of the trumpet can be blended together seamlessly and should become a characteristic of the trumpet player. In addition, with practice, a trumpet player can develop their sound into a dichotomy that lies between the two registers.
