But she also became a champion in the fight to end welfare dependency, beginning at a homeless shelter just outside Pittsburgh. Now a stay-at-home mom of three sons, Smith is one of 200 recipients of the Works Progress Administration's 2014 Pioneer Award, the highest honor the state can give someone "for their effort in improving the welfare of West Virginia." The oldest of three siblings, Smith was the first in her family to go to college. "We were raised to believe that you are better than whatever you are the day before," she said, explaining her motivation for becoming an inspiration to thousands of other children. The Pioneer Award, originally introduced during the New Deal to celebrate the accomplishments of people who influenced the Great Depression, is the only state award that honors welfare recipients for promoting "good citizenship." Steve Tucker, director of the Appalachian Regional Commission, says the new Pioneer Award is a 79a2804d6b
