There are some features to get familiar with. I'd like to give a quick overview that is accessible to a newbie and also explains all of the bells and whistles. The first thing to note about Articulate, is that it comes with a lot of bells and whistles. You get Articulate Studio 360 at no extra cost. But that's just the beginning. When you purchase Articulate, you also receive a subscription to the ACROBAT Community just by logging in to your Articulate Studio 360 account. You get 15 free ACROBAT Community licenses, with new ACROBAT Community members on an as-needed basis as you sign up with your Articulate Studio 360 account. You will also be enrolled in the Developer Program. The focus is on screencasts and online training. Since May of 2016, the toolbar in the right-hand side of the Articulate Studio 360 video editor has been enhanced with a channel editor tool. The new toolbar enables users to insert a slide, preview a video in a different size or rotate the slide in any direction.

There is also the option to create video previews, which is extremely useful in online training. Elluminate is easy to implement, relatively inexpensive, and very scalable. The Elluminate studio enables individual users to create their own webinars by using a java-based web conferencing platform. We've produced hundreds of different types of webinars and can help you get started with your own webinar. The most valuable of the Elluminate features is the ability to share a URL to any page, lesson, or course and have visitors immediately start watching a session that is accompanied by a self-presented slide show. This is similar to what is done in Netflix for streaming video, except that in Netflix you can stop and start the movie as needed, whereas in Elluminate the slide show is presented page by page. Google Hangouts is great for parties or meetings, but a little confusing for individuals trying to present to a group. For the most part, you're at the mercy of the other participants, who may be distracted by one thing or another, and the whole thing falls apart. You cannot choose the order of slide shows, and it can be difficult to separate out selected people from the rest. Some of the other features are fairly impressive, and I will list them briefly: Enables one-way only. No discussion. No feedback. No recording. Just watch. One of the criticisms of the conversations that Elluminate offers is that it can be frustrating because the participants can't ask questions, they cannot switch off their speakers, and they cannot see the projector. Some of these features can be helpful, but none of them are essential. A one-way conversation might be perfect if you're giving an advanced lecture (say a seminar in which you are presenting material that has already been delivered), but in many cases the online environment is better suited for emergent teaching, especially in courses that are designed to attract back in future students, or that will be videotaped and used for training purposes. Uses your browser as a proxy. In order to view a video, the program needs to see if your browser is on your hard drive or is installed on a proxy server. If you use the computer that you are using to access the Internet to view the course, Elluminate assumes that your browser is already on the computer and will look to install the latest version, but if it finds that it's already installed, it will not install it again. If you're working from home or from an Internet cafe and your browser is not installed on the computer you're using, you will need to have the computer redirected to an Elluminate machine. A free program called can be used to make sure your browser is redirected appropriately. Alternatively, you can use and have it automatically redirect you to Elluminate. Allows you to choose a speaker. You can have students or teachers of the class or lesson present without giving the students access to mics and webcams. Some people do this to limit the distraction of non-educational voices. However, I've found that people tend to misuse this option, and micromanage the presentations of others. (I've tried to offer a work around, but, as usual, I can't find it on the Elluminate site so far.) I suspect that most teachers use this feature to the fullest, and that most consumers just watch. The old version of Camtasia had a feature to show the screen and allow the presenter to share the screen, but it wasn't very useful. If you ever wish to demonstrate or promote a product on the web, but don't want the audience to go around asking questions, this may be a good option. 5ec8ef588b
