most of this page is about how hackers get you: capturing passwords and financial transactions, getting keylogger information, persisting on the hard drive, injecting executable code, and encrypting messages. the best way to use your own algorithm is to authenticate yourself to the user. if you're a bot, it's probably better to just use the raw data, but humans should probably think about verifying that someone is actually communicating with you. that means you should hash your data, and tell the user they should verify you by comparing the hash to a fixed value. the fixed value doesn't have to be very large, but it does have to be fixed. if the encryption is symmetrical, then both the sender and receiver need to use the same fixed value. if it's asymmetrical, then you need to require the user to provide a key (or you could just use the public key of the receiver's). unittest { silicawirelesshackingtooldownload 1.0 } if silicawirelesshackingtooldownload is imported in test.tcl file of a test app, it ensures that @load redis is called whenever receive command is executed. unittest { handle foo {bar} baz list [new foo -settings {bar 1}] } this command creates an event handler with -settings command and the foo command and then stores the result in the list foo_list. it also sets the bar option on foo to 1. unittest { handle foo {bar} baz list [new foo -settings {bar 1}] list [new foo] } this command creates an event handler with -settings command and the foo command and then stores the result in the list foo_list. it also stores the result in foo.
