that said, my frustration didnt really let up when they fixed the problem. it was more frustrating that they cant be bothered to even keep us updated on any new information. no email, no text message, no nothing. by the time they realised we were out of warranty they wouldnt even reply to our email. however, after endless emails and calls to no avail they said that they had been asked to contact us again by the manufacturer. this was to arrange a new replacement kit. took a bit of digging for their contact details (it wasnt on the back of the hand jam in case you were wondering). however i got a hold of them and all is well now. the replacement kit came within a week of ordering. in short, rockwoods and lipperts lack of customer service and lack of interest in how their products are used is unsurprising and whats really frustrating is that they have the benefit of design on their hands - im not saying the handjam should have been designed any other way as its a great invention. but at the same time i cant help but feel its a bit of a waste. a special thanks to kevin for the heads up on the site. it was a true pleasure to read the entire site and see the products first hand. one of the best moments of this site was that i got to play the game battlefeild. if you want to follow my adventures or want to send me a message, you can always check out this site! its only for my own amusement though, and everyone is super happy to be here. there are no hard feelings towards anyone.

i have to give a thumbs up to the cracked team for producing a cracking product. a cracking product that has been well thought out and produced with the customer in mind. a cracking product that is comfortable enough to wear all day long and which allows you to concentrate on climbing while keeping your hands dry. a cracking product that should work in all situations and for all types of climbers from beginner to expert. the following is a brief description of the symptoms of a cracked tooth: a barely perceptible crack near the gum line. it will be noticed with the toothbrush or a probing device. the crack will be surrounded by a shiny, or glossy appearance around the crack. the crack can be seen by both visual inspection and by using an x-ray. finally, the crack can be felt by using the finger to apply pressure. the crack, if not correctly diagnosed, can cause excruciating pain, and if left untreated, infection can spread through the gum tissue, leading to bone loss and tooth loss. we took two x-rays: one was taken by the technician at lippert, the other by the technician at rockwood (who we were never able to get in touch with). in both x-rays we can clearly see that our tooth is cracked, we know it is cracked because of the way the crack looks when you examine it, and we know it is cracked because of the x-ray. in both x-rays we can clearly see that the crack is on the left side. we know its cracked because of the way the crack looks when you examine it, and we know its cracked because of the x-ray. the first x-ray clearly shows us that the crack has a shiny, or glossy appearance around it, but the second x-ray clearly shows us that the crack does not have the shiny, or glossy appearance that we expect from it. one of the x-rays clearly shows us that the crack goes from the gingival margin to the center of the tooth and the other x-ray clearly shows us that the crack goes from the gingival margin to the center of the tooth.
