Darktable for Macintosh has become the most popular free RAW editor, and really makes use of the newer Mac hardware to its advantage with a smaller footprint, fast performance, and many new features. I give it “excellent”, the highest rating, because it’s probably the fastest RAW editing program on the market. Nikon Capture NX2 is the industry benchmark, but it recently got a lot more expensive, and SpeedGrade 7 is about one-third the size and much more feature-packed. Adobe’s C1 suite—Camera RAW, Photoshop CS5, and Bridge CS5—is in the same category as these two lighter-weight RAW editors. SpeedGrade 7 has another feature which I really like, a native USB frame grabber that’s useful for rotating an image on the fly, for instance, for an animation. I also like Adobe’s new Content-Aware Fill, which is faster and more intelligent than the Photoshop past versions included in C1. I expect that it will make a lot of technical editors happy, because it does, in fact, make good use of the many higher-resolution photos available for it to work from. The only downside is that it automatically makes a title card around the subject, so you need to remove it if you don’t want it. It’s a texture, not a photograph. It’s also just one of several in the lower lefthand portion of the photograph. The images in the right portion of the photograph were separately photographed in the same lighting by the photographer and are also textures. The top half of the photograph is golden light and the lower half is in shadow with the sun going down.
