Functional significance of the nestin-expressing progenitor cells in the rat corpus callosum: regulation of growth cone dynamics. Expression of the intermediate filament protein nestin is found in multipotential neural stem and progenitor cells, and this protein is also transiently expressed in actively growing axons during the early stages of embryonic and postnatal development. To identify the function of nestin-expressing progenitor cells in the corpus callosum, the distribution pattern of nestin-expressing progenitor cells was examined in callosal projection neurons at different stages of postnatal development. In 1-day-old rats, nestin was transiently expressed in axons, in addition to being expressed in a subset of glial cells in the inner plexiform layer and in the subventricular zone. In the adult rat corpus callosum, both the number and morphology of nestin-expressing cells increased markedly, and nestin expression persisted in the axons. Immunoelectron microscopy indicated that nestin-expressing cells were located in the subventricular zone, the intermediate zone, and the upper and lower submolecular layers. The majority of nestin-immunoreactive cells had a round or oval shape, and most of them were bipolar multipotential progenitor cells. To identify their role, nestin was ectopically expressed in adult rat corpus callosum. Double labeling for nestin and growth-associated protein 43 indicated that the number of nestin-immunoreactive cells was not increased by ectopic expression of nestin. The density of the axonal population revealed that the expression of nestin protein did not affect the growth of axons in the corpus callosum. However, when the axons extended their growth cones beyond the midline on patterned substrates, the growth of these axons was strongly affected by the presence of nestin protein. These results suggest that the nestin-expressing progenitor cells in the corpus callosum are multipotential glial cells and their growth-promoting activity is modulated by contact with axons.
