The transfer rate that is being used by OpenSSL is the minimal amount of data that is being sent per time unit. The rate is given in kilobits per second (kbps). This is the measure of the number of bits transferred in a given time period. Therefore, if the rate is given in kbps and the time period is in seconds, then the rate is measured in bits per second (bps). The transfer rate is a useful characteristic of a SSL/TLS implementation. It indicates how fast the data is being transferred from a client to the server and vice versa and can, thus, have an effect on the performance of the network. An SSL implementation will only allow the maximal transfer rate to be used
