Fujifilm's X-Pro2 is a great camera, and the X-E2 is even better. The RAW file output from X-Trans sensors is also quite good. Lightroom 5 does a good job with these RAW files, producing results of good quality with minimal work. I'm sure Adobe will continue to offer new features to better utilize the new hybrid X-Trans sensors. The integration felt as it should, using all the various camera apps and sources to build a holistic photo experience. To be on the safe side, I applied the Exposure-Bracketing features before shooting (one of my favorite features of volume 4). When it comes to video editing, that's where the Lightroom team's digital chopsticks are less useful – there's no real advantage to "Lightroom" video editing. Yes, what Lightroom normally would do, but done in separate apps. Regardless, the new Hybrid Autofocus is the best I've ever seen. I'm not about blur any more. The best way I've described to photographers and videographers is that the AF system tries to tell you, by displaying with RGB colors, which sensor to aim at first. The outermost, direct light sources are easier to see than the sensors, so there's no guess work. Refer to the manual if you don't see it immediately. I'm sure the ultimate goal is to have a true "Matrix" system that works on the same principle, but the problems of trying to make that make it completely un-reliable. Linux users should be warned, Adobe has apparently yet to take the time needed to figure out how to create a stable, straightforward way to add new hardware and drivers. So far, we've been forced to use the old, clunky tools in the Processing window.
