Subpopulations of the peripheral blood lymphocytes were distinguished in the patients suffering from rheumatic fever and rheumatic polyarthritis according to the estimation of the content of intracellular G and E and its variation in the presence of the reversible cytolytic effect of the sensitized lymphocytes on the lymphocytes from the same blood sample. The comparison of the data obtained with those from the same patients with rheumatic fever on remission and from normal donors proved the significant increase of the content of P cells and the decrease of the content of E cells in patients with active rheumatic fever as compared with the data obtained with those from the patients with rheumatic fever on remission and with the data from normal donors. The data obtained evidence the crucial role of lymphocytes in the development of the immune response and the pathogenesis of rheumatic fever.If for any reason the cancel function fails to work we want to display a message stating so.
