Laboratory tests were examined in 1556 patients aged 40-69 who had been hospitalized for myocardial infarction (MI) and in 408 randomly selected age- and sex-matched reference subjects in respect to their individual and combined predictive value for evolution to death or reinfarction. The predictive values of serum total cholesterol, leukocyte count and platelet count were high. Their predictive values were significantly lower after adjustment for apolipoprotein B levels. These findings support the concept that the increased risk of reinfarction after an MI can be due not only to a prothrombotic state but also to a proatherogenic state. The predictive values of high-density lipoprotein (HDL)-cholesterol, triglycerides, C-reactive protein, creatinine and thyroid-stimulating hormone were low. Their predictive values were not significantly related to the levels of apolipoprotein B and Lp(a) after adjustment for LDL cholesterol. The regression coefficients for these laboratory variables and the sum of their regression coefficients indicated that the risk of reinfarction was 1.5% for a decrease of 1 mg/dl in HDL cholesterol, 4.3% for a decrease of 1 mg/dl in triglycerides, 3.3% for an increase of 1 mg/dl
